

Crime Analytics: Visualization of Incident Reports in San Francisco in Summer 2014

Did someone just steal your personal belonging? Sure, we can go ahead and file a police report, and hope that this will bring justice to the wrongdoer. But did you know that only about 20% of the crimes reported in San Francisco leads to arrest? Analyzing data from 2014 summer as sourced by Socrata, San Francisco shows not so astounding results of incidents and police resolutions:

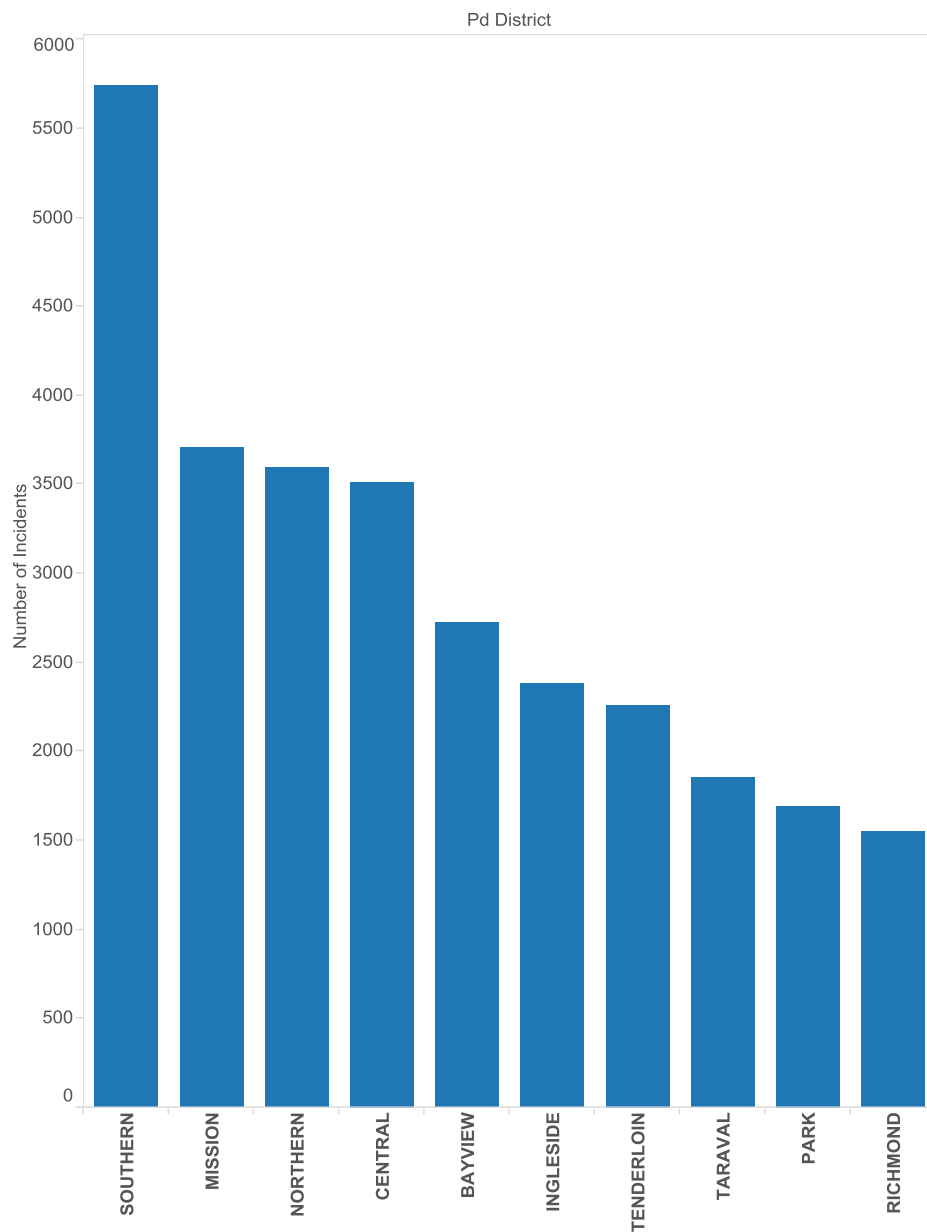

Before you get worried, we might also want to look at the types of crimes committed in San Francisco:

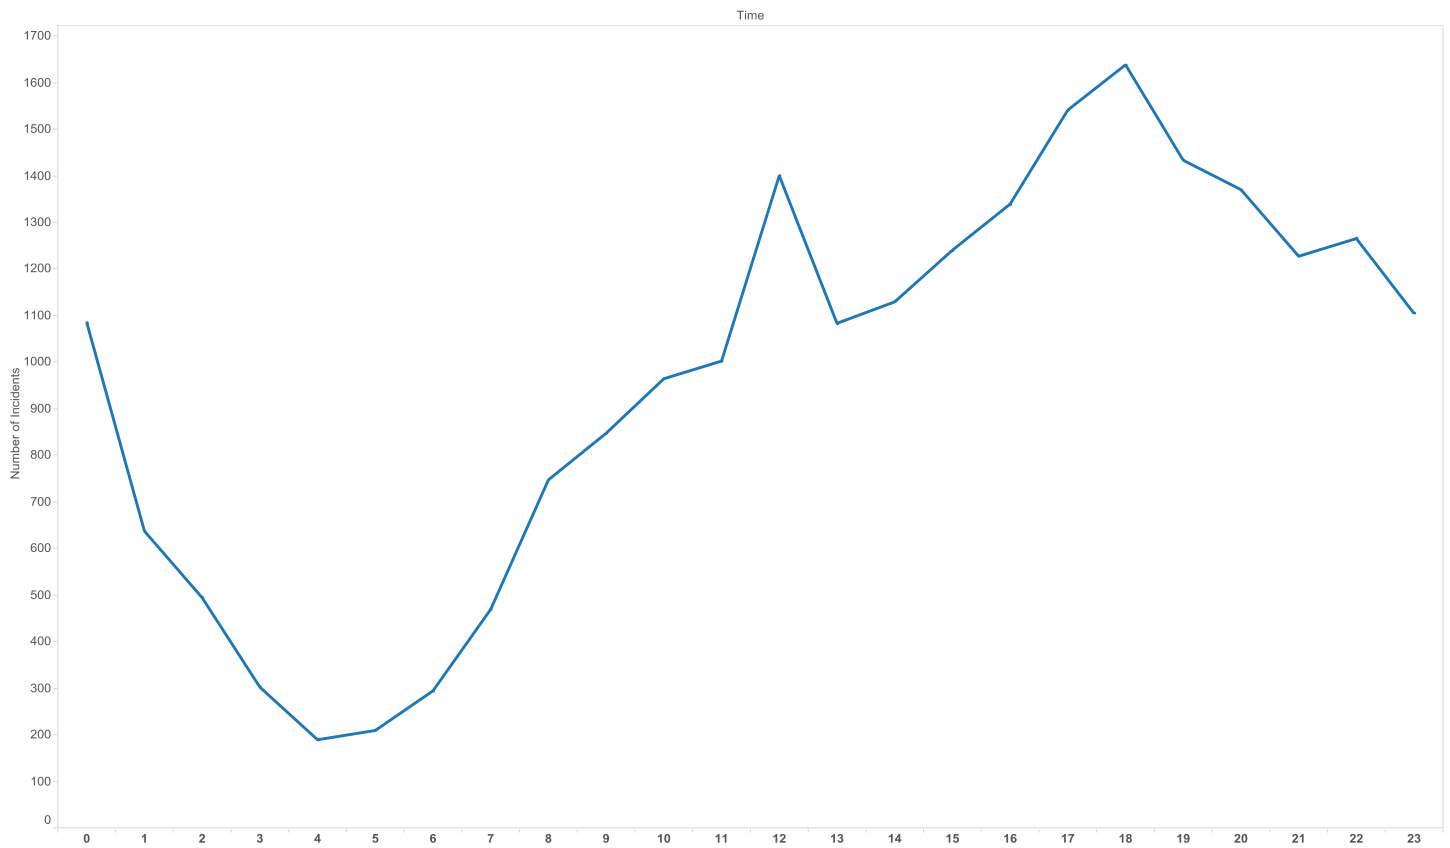

Majority (~40%) of crimes committed fall into larceny, followed by other offenses such as traffic violation or resisting arrest, then non-criminal crimes.

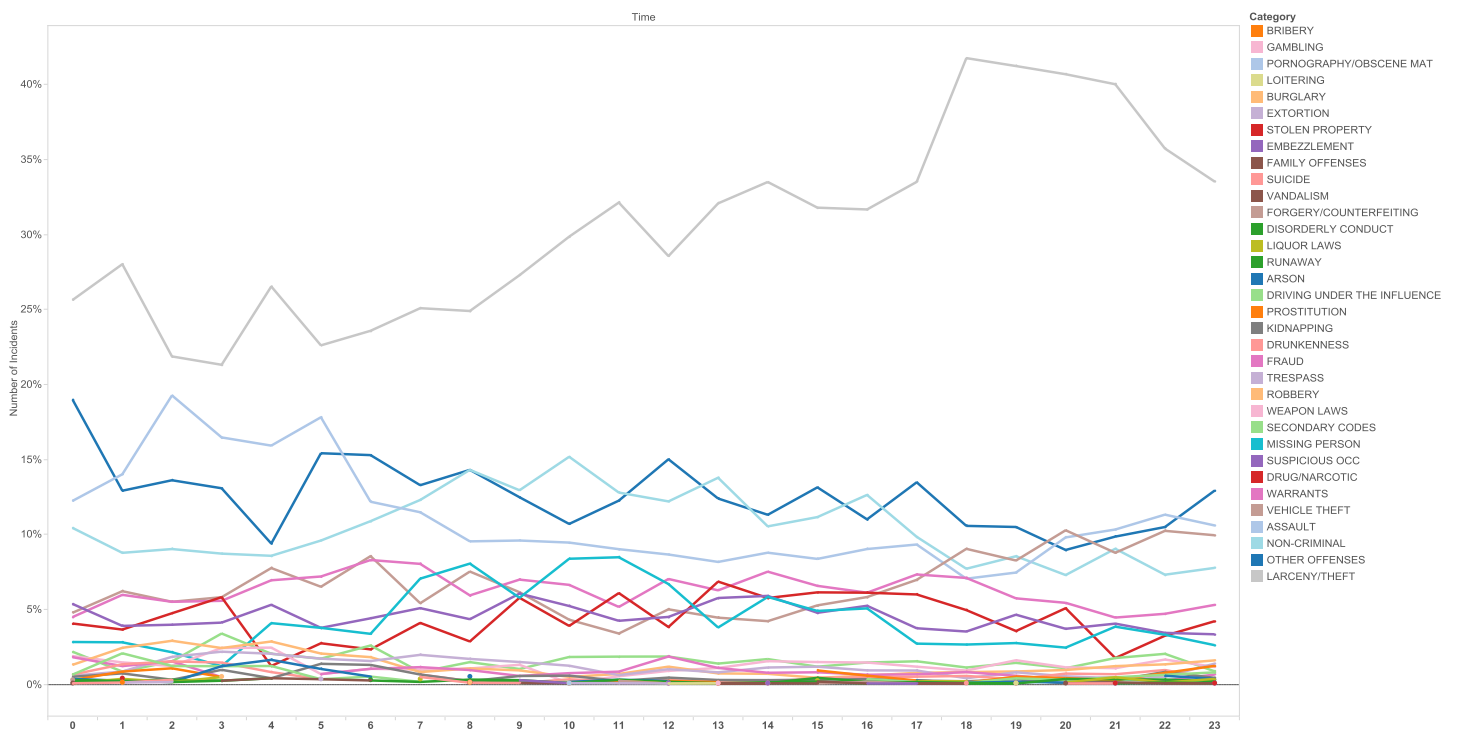

So where is the safest district in San Francisco? The least safe area? My analysis shows that the Southern district is the least safe district by a wide margin compared to other districts. Richmond is your best bet if you want to stay away from most of the crimes that happen throughout the city.

Now, you might also wonder what time and day of the week is the safest to leave your belongings out in the public. Look no further:

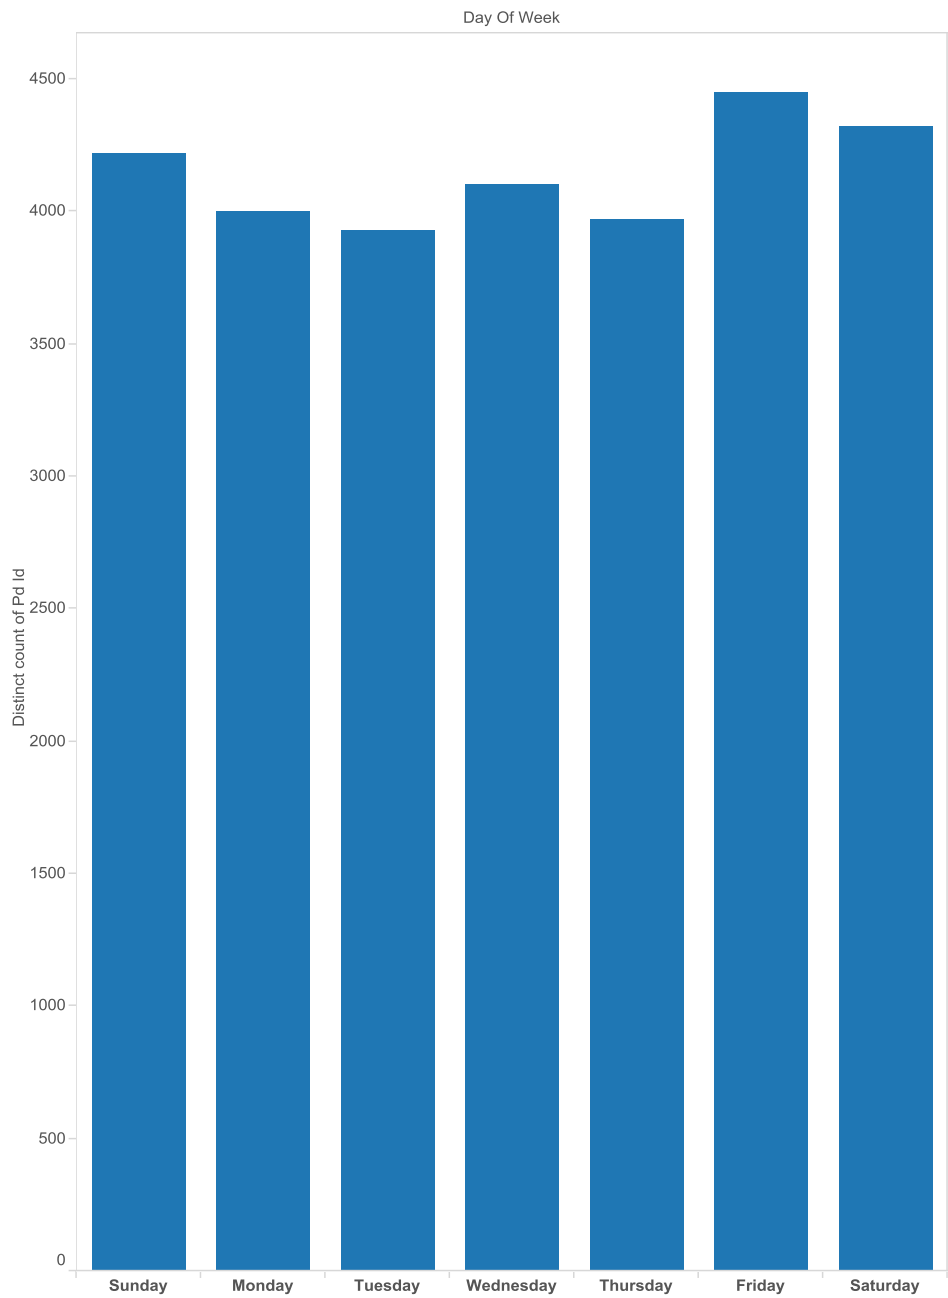

We can see that the crime peaks after 5PM, and slows down in the early morning time when not many people are wandering around. But what if we subset the data further into its own category?

Larceny peaks from 6PM to 9PM, but assault peaks from 2AM to 5AM. I guess there are many drunkards practicing violence at that time.

Day of week is more interesting, or less interesting depending on how you look at it, because there really isn't much of relationship, although Friday, Saturday and Sunday seem to show a bit more activity than weekdays:

So what's the safest strategy to live in a bustling city of San Francisco? Only go out between when the sun is out on weekdays, and make sure you are in Richmond. Make sure you keep your belongings to yourself since theft is the most common. Oh, and forget about filing that police report.
